ANCHOR LEDE

This Breast Cancer Awareness Month, health care providers are reminding you that, while it's rare, the ailment can affect men.

Tim Ditman of OSF HealthCare has more.

Heather Thompson is a breast cancer survivor who's now a breast health navigator at OSF. She says men don't need regular mammograms like women. But they should keep an eye on their chest for inverted nipples, lumps, redness or achiness.

Treatment would involve surgery to remove the breast tissue.

"There's not much tissue that a man has. We will still test those lymph nodes during surgery to make sure the cancer hasn't spread. After that, there's special testing called oncotype. If it's a high score, those people sometimes have to have chemotherapy or radiation." (:28)
